

very rapidly, for otherwise the speed cannot be kept up. It cannot be dilated in the cylinder or reservoir without great danger of explosion, and by the ordinary process only the external surface of the air immediately exposed to the action of heat is rapidly dilated, the internal molecule being a bad conductor, requiring great time for dilation. M. Andraud gets rid of all this difficulty by passing the air through a very long spiral tube immerse in boiling lead, and in this way the whole is dilated in the twelfth part of a section, and a reservoir of the piston, which contains the same quantity of air undiluted gives only 2,200. Another of the experiments was in an air cannon. Balls were thrown from it, which at a distance of 200 feet broken in the roof of a building and lodged with great force in a wall, although the air was compressed to only 20 atmospheres.—M. Andraud proposes that batteries in towns shall be worked by compressed air instead of powder or wind to compress the air, being according to M. Poucet, only one 75th part of powder, and if compressed by a steam engine above one 50th. M. Andraud imagines that field artillery may be worked in the same manner, as the horses drawing the guns to the field, would, by the motion of the wheels fill all the reservoirs necessary for a long battle. The next experiment was on the power of compressed air in raising water either for the supply of towns or for the draining of marshes, mines, &c. By a apparatus, a column of water was thrown to a height of 75 feet.—Whig Republican.
